

The next morning, before the bright cap of the sun broke into the sky, the men began their long journey home. They paddled during daylight, and spent nights sleeping along the rocky shores of rivers and lakes. They paddled through high summer and into early fall, their spirited voices carrying through the air as they sang their songs, dipping and pulling their way home.

